LEADING EDITORIALS FROM THE NEW YORK PAPERS THIS MORNING.

THE COMING SESSION OF CONGRESS.

The thirty-ninth Congress is soon to reappear. "Superfluous" the veteran on the stage. It has made some figure in its time, but has had its day. It is part during the winter will not be much else than pantomime.

This present lack of importance comes from the cause. The war is in its culmination. Military affairs still dominate. It is believed that we have reached the last period of the war, but the rebels still resist as firmly as ever, and there is no chance for any legislation except in maintenance of the established war policy.

All the great war measures, dependent on Congress, have been passed. There is no need for practical operation, calling for no change save in details, in insignificant details. It is not the legislative body, peace measures, or, in fact, any great measure, that is needed. The war is a purely military character. The immediate future is of uncertain to justify beyond what can be avoided, any legislative action of a purely military character. There is no legislation of this character which could not be yet to be passed.

It is true that the President's message may have to be the basis of any legislation, and that the President's message may have to be the basis of any legislation, and that the President's message may have to be the basis of any legislation.

The other cause for the unimportant part to be played by this Congress during the remainder of the war, is the fact that the President's message will be the basis of any legislation, and that the President's message will be the basis of any legislation.

The new House will be five-sixths supporters of President Lincoln—a preponderance that can be relied upon, and with redoubled power. It will come fresh from the people, unincumbered by Congressional traditions, and with the patriotic glow, the great national spirit, that so nobly sustained the declaration of 1861. It will be both disposed and prepared to deal, on the highest national grounds, with the great questions that are before it.
